Concerto No. 1, Op. 19

violin and piano

Edited by Joseph Szigeti

Preface to the Revised Edition

The revision of a piece of music by an editor is necessarily only one man's view of the work in question and it is only in actual practice that the suggestions made in such a revision can justify themselves or otherwise. In the case of classical works that have come down to us in many (and sometimes distorted) versions—like Tartini's Devil's Trill sonata, the Vitali Chaconne or Corelli's La Folia—a statement of the Editor's guiding principles, sources etc. (i.e. a Revisionsbericht, as it is called in German) is necessary.

In the present case, however, we still have the so-called Urtext (published by Edition A. Gutheil, 1921 and later [1947] re-issued by Boosey & Hawkes) at our disposal. I have been able, therefore, to limit myself—apart from some slight changes which the composer effected in the first movement as an afterthought (3 bars before 15 and 3 bars after 15)—to performance-suggestions that are the result of the many dozens of performances I gave of this Concerto during four decades.

My suggestions between 28 and 29 in the Scherzo, for instance, that certain notes should be doubled (played in unison) aims at the realisation of the rugged, fierce character inherent in this passage. The alternative offered for the octave slides up to E (4 bars after 32 etc.) in the Scherzo is another such suggestion based on performance experience. At 34 in the Scherzo the original text did not make quite clear that up-bows were meant to be used throughout. That the fingerings of the bass notes at 44 are meant to bring out the bass character of this accompaniment figure should be obvious from the context. This is perhaps the place to point out that the composer did not indicate a change of tempo in the Scherzo (Vivacissimo) between 28 and 30 and that therefore no appreciable slowing-down is warranted in the staccato marcatisissimo section. A tempo should be chosen which allows the negotiation of both sections at approximately the same speed.

The passage four bars from 60 is of course played as an uninterrupted double-stopped tremolo in sixths with only the bow alternating between the E and A strings.
